archaeological artifacts had already been identified in the early 20th century.

Several excavation campaigns conducted between 1993 and 2012 documented vestiges of at least 12 dwellings and several streets. Based on the building techniques, decorations and furnishings discovered, their construction was dated to the 14th century.

The most abundant finds in Ceuta’s archaeological record from this century, as a large part of the Islamic city was conquered by Portugal in 1415. The Portuguese, with a smaller population, was essentially confined to a narrow strip, leaving the rest of the territory sparsely inhabited. Such was the case of this hastily abandoned settlement.

Now recovered and displayed in the center.

Public Library, the sight of these ruins reminds us that Ceuta lived six centuries ago.
